

About the Authors.

Angela Ranson (amr524@york.ac.uk) is a doctoral student at the University of York. Her research interests focus on the Church of England and the English Reformation. In 2012, she published an article about recantation strategies in the inaugural issue of the Journal of History and Cultures. This followed a 2011 article about the contributions of the Nicodemites to the Elizabethan church, published in the University of Limerick's journal History Studies. In 2009, she acted as co-editor and contributing author for a book about adult illiteracy entitled Breaking the Word Barrier.

Jennifer Crane (j.m.crane@warwick.ac.uk) is a first-year doctoral student at the University of Warwick researching the emergence of the concept of 'child abuse' in the British context between 1960 and 2012. She holds a BA in Philosophy, Politics, and Economics from the University of Oxford, and an MA in the History of Medicine from the University of Warwick. This article is based on the research conducted for her Masters dissertation on the evacuation of British children during World War Two.

Niall MacGalloway (njm23@st-andrews.ac.uk) is currently a doctoral student at the University of St Andrews, having completed his undergraduate and postgraduate degrees at the University of Edinburgh. His doctoral thesis is entitled, 'The Italian Occupation of South-Eastern France, 1940-1943'. His research interests include Italian Fascism, the Second World War, societies under occupation, collaboration and resistance, inter-war Europe, post-war Italy and twentieth-century France.

Stewart McCain (stewart.mccain@history.ox.ac.uk) has degrees in History from the universities of Sussex and Oxford. He is currently completing his doctorate, entitled 'The Language Question under Napoleon' at Worcester College, Oxford, and is interested in diverse aspects of the social, cultural and political history of France during the 'long' nineteenth century.

Caitlin Scott (C.Scott@warwick.ac.uk) is currently a Masters student in History at the University of Warwick, having graduated from Warwick with a BA (Hons) in History. Her research interests include the social, cultural and religious history of seventeenth-century England. Her current dissertation project investigates the three-way interaction between central government at Whitehall, local magistrates, populations and radical religious sects during the Interregnum of 1649-1660, focusing on the practical implementation and limits of official policies at local level.

Will Riddington (wr245@cam.ac.uk) is a first-year History doctoral student at the University of Cambridge. He studied at the University of Leeds for his undergraduate and Masters degrees. This paper is an extract from his MA dissertation, a rhetorical analysis of the New Right that also explored the Iran-Contra affair and President Clinton's healthcare reforms. His current research focuses on the relationship between rhetoric and policy formation in the Reagan Administration, with a particular focus on the extent of grassroots influence in this process.

Adam Timmins (a.d.timmins@lboro.ac.uk) is a final-year postgraduate student at Loughborough University.

