Materials with molecular-scale porosity are important in wide range of energy applications such as gas storage, molecular separation, heterogeneous catalysis, energy generation and energy storage.

The ability to rationally predict and hence design the porous properties of materials for specific energy applications is a key challenge for materials discovery. Here, I show how taking a bottom-up approach and assessing the structure-directing influences of the material building blocks can lead to new ‘rational design’ strategies.