The economic crisis has meant that some people feel they cannot afford to retire but also that many employers are cutting back on their workforces. In the decade before the crisis, "post-retirement-age workers" constituted the fastest growing group in the UK workforce. Cross-sectional and longitudinal data from the labour force survey (LFS) is used to investigate the working patterns, occupations and earnings of such workers, to compare those who changed job as they approached retirement age with those who stayed in the same job, and to look at the process of transition from one job or employer to another. Data from a representative sample of establishments is used for a complementary

			examination of employer practices. Of interest is how applications to continue working are treated and how those who are employed are hired. It is clear that those who work beyond retirement age are very different from other workers. There is a much higher incidence of non-standard working among the former group, even if most post-retirement-age workers seem to be working on a non-standard basis voluntarily and not involuntarily. Post-retirement-age workers are to be found at the top of the occupational hierarchy. However, they are concentrated disproportionately at the bottom. Whether post-retirement-age working will continue to grow as the recession bites further is an open question.
